Mental Illness, Trauma, and Family Conflict in Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom

Radhakanta Mendali[1], Dr. Vasant Prabhakar Gawai[2]

[1]Research Scholar, Department of English, MATS University, Raipur, Chhattisgarh

[2]Assistant Professor, Department of English, MATS University, Raipur, Chhattisgarh

ABSTRACT

Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom shows the life of a family living with mental illness. The novel is narrated by an unnamed son who tries to understand his mother, Em, and her bipolar disorder. Em is loving, funny, and intelligent, but she also experiences deep sadness, fear, confusion, and suicidal thoughts. Her illness changes the daily life of the Mendes family, who live in a small apartment in Bombay. The father, called the Big Hoom, remains calm and supportive, while the son and daughter, Susan, learn to live with fear, worry, and uncertainty. This paper studies mental illness, trauma, and family conflict in the novel. It shows that Em's illness does not affect her alone; it also creates emotional pain for every member of the family. The son loves his mother, but he also feels afraid of her unpredictable behaviour. He worries that he may inherit her illness and spends much of his life trying to understand its cause. The novel also presents trauma through memories, silence, fear, and repeated attempts by Em to harm herself. At the same time, Pinto does not present the family only as victims. He shows their love, patience, humour, and care. The Big Hoom's quiet support and the children's efforts to understand Em make the family strong in difficult times. The paper argues that the novel presents mental illness in a humane way. It moves beyond labels such as "madness" and shows Em as a complete human being with pain, love, intelligence, and dignity. Through the Mendes family, Pinto shows that mental illness can create conflict, but it can also deepen love and understanding. The novel teaches readers to respond to mental illness with empathy rather than fear or judgement.

Keywords: Mental illness, Trauma, Family conflict, Caregiving

INTRODUCTION

Mental illness is one of the most sensitive subjects in Indian society. For many years, people have used words such as "mad," "pagal," and "mental" without understanding the pain behind them. Families often hide mental illness because they fear shame, social rejection, and misunderstanding. Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom (2012) breaks this silence. The novel presents mental illness not as a strange or shameful condition, but as a painful human experience that affects both the sufferer and the family. Through the story of the Mendes family, Pinto shows how bipolar disorder shapes love, fear, memory, trauma, and everyday family life.

Em and the Big Hoom is the story of Imelda Mendes, called "Em," her husband Augustine, known as "the Big Hoom," their daughter Susan, and their unnamed son, who narrates the novel. The family lives in a small apartment in Mahim, Bombay. Em suffers from bipolar disorder, earlier called manic depression. Her illness brings periods of deep depression, anxiety, strange thoughts, and suicide attempts. The narrator grows up watching his mother's suffering and trying to understand why she became ill. He loves her deeply, but he also feels afraid of her. This mixture of love and fear becomes the emotional centre of the novel.

The novel begins with a simple but powerful description of the family: "She was Em, and our father, sometimes, was The Big Hoom" (Pinto 1). These names show the closeness of the family, but they also show that the family lives in its own private world. Em is not presented only as a "mad woman." She is a mother, a wife, a thinker, a storyteller, and a person with humour and intelligence. However, her mental illness affects every relationship in the house. The son says, "I didn't really know what we were as a family. I only knew that something was wrong with all of us and that it had something to do with my mother and her nerves" (Pinto 5). This line shows that mental illness becomes a family experience, not only an individual problem.

This research paper studies mental illness, trauma, and family conflict in Em and the Big Hoom. It argues that Pinto presents bipolar disorder with sympathy and realism. He does not treat Em as a symbol of madness alone. Instead, he shows her as a complex human being whose illness creates pain but does not erase her identity. The paper also argues that the novel shows trauma as an experience shared by the whole family. Em suffers from her illness, but her husband and children also carry emotional wounds. "Em refuses to become a mere statistic or a diagnostic label, embodying the agency to shape her narrative beyond the constraints of clinical definitions." (Tiwari and Das 2). They live with fear, guilt, silence, and uncertainty. Finally, the paper shows that family conflict in the novel is not caused by hatred. It grows from love, helplessness, and the difficulty of living with an illness that cannot be fully understood.

Mental illness is the central theme of Em and the Big Hoom. Em's condition is first described through vague words. The narrator explains that people first called it a "nervous problem," then a "nervous breakdown," and later manic depression (Pinto 28). This changing language shows how society often fails to understand mental illness. "The novel provides an intimate portrayal of Em's bipolar disorder, capturing her manic highs and depressive lows." (Tiwari and Das 3). Doctors, family members, and society use different labels, but none of them fully explains Em's suffering. Em herself uses one simple word: "mad." The narrator says, "Through it all, she had only one word for herself: mad" (Pinto 28). This word is painful because it carries social shame, but Em uses it boldly. She refuses to hide behind polite medical terms.

Pinto presents Em's illness through her behaviour, speech, and memories. At times, Em is full of energy and speaks rapidly. At other times, she becomes silent, hopeless, and suicidal. Her thoughts often move from one subject to another. She speaks about God, sex, death, politics, family, and her own fears. This unstable speech reflects her mental state. However, Pinto does not make her speech meaningless. "It is intriguing to examine the manifestation of childhood emotional neglect in the persona of the narrator and the intricate interplay of anger, guilt, and duty that it sets off." (Madhur and Singh 19). Em's words often contain truth, humour, and deep emotional pain. She uses language to fight against the silence imposed on people with mental illness.

The novel also shows that mental illness cannot be separated from the body, mind, and society. Recent research describes manic depression in the novel as a complex interaction of bodily, cognitive, and cultural factors ("Conceptualizing Manic Depression"). This means that Em's illness is not only a medical problem. It is also shaped by her social world, her family history, and her personal memories. Pinto shows that Em's suffering cannot be reduced to a diagnosis. She is more than "bipolar." She is a woman who has lived through poverty, marriage, motherhood, religious fear, and social pressure. The novel also questions the way society treats people with mental illness. Em is sometimes feared, pitied, or controlled by others. Yet the narrator never fully accepts the label of madness. He tries to see his mother as a person. This is important because stigma often makes patients feel less than human. Pinto's novel challenges this stigma by giving Em a strong voice. Even in her most difficult moments, she speaks, argues, jokes, and remembers. Her voice makes the reader see her humanity.

Trauma and Memory

Trauma is another major theme in the novel. Trauma means deep emotional injury caused by painful experiences. In Em and the Big Hoom, trauma appears in many forms. Em carries the trauma of her past, including her difficult childhood, poverty, family problems, and fear of abandonment. The narrator carries the trauma of growing up in a house where his mother's illness creates constant tension. Susan also suffers silently. The Big Hoom carries the trauma of watching his wife suffer for many years.

The novel is built through memory. The narrator does not tell the story in a straight line. He moves between past and present, between childhood memories and adult reflections. This broken structure matches the nature of trauma. "The novel offers one of the most authentic and sensitive portrayals of bipolar disorder in contemporary Indian literature." (Dhanyashree a719) Painful memories do not stay in the past; they return again and again. The narrator remembers Em's suicide attempts, her hospital visits, her strange words, and the fear in the house. These memories shape his identity.

One of the most painful aspects of the novel is the narrator's fear that he may become like his mother. He watches Em closely and wonders whether her illness is inherited. This fear creates psychological conflict. He loves Em, but he also fears her illness. He wants to understand her, but he also wants to protect himself. This conflict shows how trauma can pass from one generation to another. "It is intriguing to examine the manifestation of childhood emotional neglect in the persona of the narrator and the intricate interplay of anger, guilt, and duty that it sets off." (Madhur and Singh 19). The child may not have the same illness, but he inherits the fear, silence, and emotional burden of the family. Scholars have also studied this aspect of the novel. Rasquinha and colleagues examine childhood emotional neglect and family dynamics in the novel, showing that language, silence, and family relationships are closely connected to mental illness ("Neglect, Emotional Abuse"). Their study supports the idea that Em's illness cannot be understood apart from the family environment. Similarly, research on trauma and caregiving in the novel argues that the narrator experiences secondary trauma because he lives with and cares for a mentally ill parent ("Mental Illness, Trauma and Caregiving"). This means that caregivers also suffer emotionally, even when they are not the direct patients.

The novel shows that trauma is not always loud or visible. Sometimes it appears in small moments: a child waiting outside a hospital room, a father sitting silently beside his wife, a daughter avoiding conversation, or a son asking questions that no one can answer. These quiet moments create a deep sense of pain. Pinto's strength as a writer is that he shows trauma through ordinary family life rather than through dramatic scenes alone.

Family conflict in Em and the Big Hoom is complex. The Mendes family loves one another, but love does not remove conflict. Em's illness creates tension because her behaviour is unpredictable. She may become angry, suspicious, depressed, or withdrawn. The children do not always know how to respond. The Big Hoom tries to remain calm, but he also carries great emotional pressure. The Big Hoom is one of the most important characters in the novel. He is quiet, patient, and responsible. He goes to work, manages the house, and visits Em in the hospital. The narrator says, "We began our hospital visits: one day Susan, one day me, everyday The Big Hoom" (Pinto 11). This routine shows the burden of caregiving. The family's life begins to move around Em's illness. Hospital visits become normal. The children learn early that their mother may need help at any time.

The Big Hoom's care is silent but powerful. He does not always express his feelings in words. Instead, he shows love through action. He stays with Em, protects the children, and keeps the family together. However, his silence also creates distance. The narrator sometimes wonders what his father feels. The novel asks an important question: who cares for the caregiver? The Big Hoom gives care to Em and the children, but he receives very little emotional support himself. The children also experience conflict. Susan often appears practical and controlled, while the narrator is more reflective and anxious. Both children love their mother, but they also feel trapped by her illness. They cannot live a normal childhood because the family's attention is always focused on Em. This creates resentment, guilt, and confusion. They may feel angry with Em, but then feel guilty for being angry. This emotional cycle is common in families dealing with long-term mental illness.

The novel shows that caregiving is an act of love, but it can also become exhausting. Caregivers may feel responsible for saving the patient, even when they cannot control the illness. This responsibility creates stress. In the Indian context, caregiving is often seen as a family duty. Families are expected to care for sick members without complaint. Pinto shows both the beauty and the burden of this duty. The Mendes family does not abandon Em. Their care is an act of loyalty. Yet their care also limits their freedom and creates emotional pain.

Although the novel deals with pain, it is not hopeless. Pinto uses humour to show the strength of the family. Em is often funny. Her jokes, sharp comments, and unusual observations make her more than a patient. Humour becomes a way of surviving. It allows the family to face pain without being completely destroyed by it.

The novel contains the famous line, "Love is never enough. Madness is enough" (Pinto 205). This line is difficult and powerful. It suggests that love alone cannot cure mental illness. A family may love a person deeply, but love cannot remove depression, mania, or suicidal thoughts. At the same time, the word "madness" becomes a force that shapes the family's life. It is painful, but it also creates a special bond between them. The family learns to live with madness, not because they accept suffering, but because they refuse to abandon one another. This idea is important for the study of mental illness in literature. Many novels present mental illness as something to be cured or removed. Pinto presents it as something to be understood and lived with. The novel does not offer an easy solution. Em does not suddenly become "normal." The family does not become perfect. But they continue to love, care, and survive. This is a realistic and humane view of mental illness.

Critics have praised the novel for its compassionate treatment of bipolar disorder. A study published in TIJER argues that Pinto "dismantles stigma" and presents mental illness through empathy, resilience, and intergenerational trauma ("Representation of Mental Health"). Another study notes that the novel shows the experiences of caregivers and presents mental disorder through the eyes of the family ("A Psychoanalytic Exploration"). These readings support the argument that Pinto's novel is not only about Em's illness. It is also about the family's struggle to remain human in difficult conditions. The novel is set in Bombay, now Mumbai, in the late twentieth century. This setting is important. The Mendes family is Roman Catholic and Goan, living in a middle-class urban environment. Their small apartment becomes a symbol of their restricted life. The family has little space, little money, and little privacy. Em's illness makes this space even more suffocating.

Indian society often associates mental illness with shame. Families may avoid talking about it because they fear what relatives, neighbours, and society will say. Pinto shows this social pressure through the family's silence. The children do not easily explain their mother's condition to outsiders. The family lives with a secret that is both private and heavy. At the same time, the novel shows that mental illness exists in every kind of family. It is not limited to poor families, uneducated families, or broken homes. The Mendes family is loving, educated, and close. Yet they still suffer. This universality makes the novel important. It tells readers that mental illness can enter any home and that no family should be judged for it.

The novel also reflects the limitations of mental health care in India. Em is taken to hospitals and given treatment, but her recovery is uncertain. The family must depend on doctors, medicines, and their own emotional strength. Research on the novel notes that Pinto presents the Indian mental health care system and questions issues of consent and autonomy for mentally ill patients ("Patient's Consent and Autonomy"). This shows that the novel has a social purpose. It asks readers to think about how society treats people with mental illness and their families.

Conclusion

The main purpose of this study is to examine how Jerry Pinto presents mental illness, trauma, and family conflict in Em and the Big Hoom. The study uses textual analysis as its main method. It closely reads important scenes, dialogues, and memories from the novel. It also uses ideas from trauma theory, caregiving studies, and mental health humanities. The study is divided into several areas. First, it examines Em's bipolar disorder and the way Pinto presents her as a human being rather than a stereotype. Second, it studies trauma in the narrator's life and in the family as a whole. Third, it explores family conflict, especially the emotional burden placed on the Big Hoom, Susan, and the narrator. Finally, it studies caregiving, love, humour, and resilience in the Mendes household.

The study argues that Em and the Big Hoom is an important Indian novel because it speaks honestly about a subject that is often hidden. It does not present mental illness as a moral failure or a family shame. Instead, it shows that mental illness is a human condition that requires understanding, care, and social support. The novel also shows that families affected by mental illness are not weak. They may be wounded, but they also show remarkable strength.

REFERENCES

1. Pinto, Jerry. Em and the Big Hoom. Aleph Book Company, 2012.
2. "Conceptualizing Manic Depression in Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom." ScienceDirect, 2024, www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/S2590291124001116.
3. Rasquinha, Smitha Lamiya, et al. "Neglect, Emotional Abuse, and Family Dynamics in Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom." Journal of Language and Linguistic Studies, www.jlls.org/index.php/jlls/article/viewFile/5272/1845.
4. "Patient's Consent and Autonomy in Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom." Rupkatha Journal on Interdisciplinary Studies in Humanities, vol. 15, no. 4, 2023, rupkatha.com/V15/n4/v15n418.pdf.
5. "Mental Illness, Trauma and Caregiving in Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom." Academia.edu, 2022, www.academia.edu/85999330/.
6. "A Psychoanalytic Exploration into the Memory of a Bipolar Woman." International Journal of English Language, Literature and Culture, 2023, bcsdjournals.com/index.php/ijecls/article/view/544.
7. "Representation of Mental Health in Contemporary Indian Fiction: A Study of Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom." TIJER, vol. 12, no. 1, 2025, pp. a718–a721, tijer.org/tijer/viewpaperforall.php?paper=TIJER2501097.
8. "An Examination of the Phenomenon of Guilt in Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom." Creative Saplings, 2025, creativesaplings.in/index.php/1/article/view/1061.
9. Poli, Amala. "The Insightful in the Personal Narrative: Reading Jerry Pinto's Em and the Big Hoom." Medical Health Humanities, 24 Oct. 2018, medicalhealthhumanities.com/2018/10/24/.
10. Verma, Kirti. "Narrative, Mental Distress, Care and Family in Jerry Pinto's Oeuvre." The Polyphony, 19 Aug. 2025, thepolyphony.org/2025/08/19/.
11. Pinto, Jerry, editor. A Book of Light: When a Loved One Has a Different Mind. Speaking Tiger, 2016.
12. "Em and the Big Hoom by Jerry Pinto." Penguin Random House India, 2014, www.penguinrandomhouse.com/books /314819/em-and-the-big-hoom-by-jerry-pinto/9780143124764/readers-guide/